Price and rating show a statistically significant but practically weak positive relationship ($R^2 = 0.084$, $p < 0.0001$). While higher prices are associated with marginally higher ratings, price explains less than 10% of the variation in rating, meaning quality is driven far more by other factors, such as origin or processing method, than by price alone. A coffee's price is not reliable predictor of how well it will be rated.

This visualization highlights three key dimensions: the distribution of roast types, the relationship between price and rating, and the leading coffee-producing countries by brand count.
